Such specimens as those however, have not the newness in appearance of a recent fall--are never found quite hot--show evident, indubitable marks of age; and are the very stepping stones whereon conviction mounts unto the footstool of the Deity, who has constructed them and worlds of similar materials. Not knowing who you otherwise may be, I shall reply to your pencil observations on my memoirs in the Mechanics Magazine simply as to the secretary and responsible representative of the Royal Society. For the statements made therein coupled with the book, --on one part or the other, --must either be a subterfuge, a falsehood, or a libel. As I conclude you are incapable of using any verbal form which involves a wilfully mendacious statement, I suppose you mean to your knowledge those memoirs never were communicated to that body But I must...
