It has already become reasonably certain that freedom in itself is pleasant, and that restraint biologically speaking--that is, naturally, in naive individuals--is inherently disagreeable, whether from without or from within. I would emphasize the provisional clause in this part of my thesis, biologically speaking--that is, naturally, in the naive individual, for we shall suggest below that it loses this unpleasantness as the person becomes a psychologic personality. As the wise George Eliot says in Felix Holt, There is a sort of subjection which is the peculiar heritage of largeness and of love; and strength is often only another name for willing bondage to irremediable woes. We all know that freedom as such is pleasant, and a seven-foot shelf of books, or one even longer, might be readily written, given time, to extol freedom s pleasures in every possible realm of human experience. It has, I think, not been often effectively suggested, on the other hand, that in the unsophisticated animal, dog, or child, or savage, inhibition is essentially and inherently unpleasant (until, by submersion--see below--its disagreeableness has been mostly lost). It seems to suffice for our present concern in clothes-physiology to point out that the inhibition of impulsive tendencies (mostly pleasant on well-accepted principles) is by their very nature usually an unpleasant process. Even if unaware of the fact from personal experience, the reader cannot fail to realize that sometimes...
